7. Education An exploration of what it meant for young women to 'get an education' in New Zealand (in the late 19th Century) included sitting in class writing down scone recipes by hand, preparing for a life as homemaker. But there were some women who broke the mold, determined to make headway at a time when the institutions said no. Also a look at the kinds of schools available in NZ in the past, rights for women to study at university, and the way our education system even today, teaches kids more about gendered roles than you might think. (7 of 8, RNZ)
